

The Early Modern Studies Program (EMSP) at the University of King's College invites applications for a tenure-track position at the rank of Assistant Professor in early modern art history, commencing July 1, 2020. Candidates must have a PhD or be ABD. Candidates should have scholarly expertise in some area of early modern European art history and visual culture (fifteenth to early nineteenth centuries), and an ability to teach undergraduate courses on aesthetic theory and related topics across the early modern period. The successful candidate will be responsible for teaching and administering an interdisciplinary study-abroad course, currently being offered in Florence (<<https://ukings.ca/course/early-modern-art-literature-and-politics-in-florence-italy-2019/>>). Candidates should also have a capacity to offer lectures and tutor in the Foundation Year Program (<<https://ukings.ca/area-of-study/foundation-year-program/>>).

The EMSP is especially interested in candidates who could help enhance its ongoing curricular diversity initiatives. Specialization or teaching competence in the area of encounters between European and Indigenous/non-European cultures in early modern art and visual culture would be a particular asset.

The University of King's College is a small teaching-intensive liberal arts university with a lively academic community. Thus, while the successful candidate will be expected to engage actively in research and scholarship, demonstrated teaching excellence as well as a willingness to take on administrative duties at the program and faculty levels are essential. The position will also include regular supervision and acting as reader of EMSP undergraduate theses.
